

DUDLEY ALLEN SARGENT

Since 1980, the Dudley Allen Sargent Lecture honors the memory of a leader who devoted his professional career to promoting health and fitness for both men and women. Following a brief stint as a circus acrobat, he enrolled as a freshman at Bowdoin College when he was eighteen. Sargent supported himself through the years as the director of a college gymnasium for a salary of five dollars per week. His charismatic personality and leadership skills attracted weak and non-athletic males, who were his real concern, as well as the stronger, more highly skilled students.

Sargent then moved to Yale, where he earned his medical degree while serving as director of the gymnasium. During this time, he argued for the inclusion of physical exercising as a part of the required coursework. After securing his M.D. in 1878, he opened his own gymnasium in New York City. In 1879, Sargent was invited to fill the position of Director of the Hemenway Gymnasium and Assistant Professor of Physical Training at Harvard, where he remained until retiring in 1919. His faculty rank, however, was removed in 1889, though he kept the title of Director of Hemenway Gymnasium.

During his long and distinguished career, Sargent invented numerous "developing machines," compiled thousands of anthropometric measurements of Harvard students, educated several generations of physical education teachers (primarily women) through his Harvard Summer School of Physical Education, as well as, the Sargent School for Physical Education. Sargent wrote extensively on the subject of health and fitness, thus significantly influencing the fledgling field.

Sargent served ably as president of the American Association for the Advancement of Physical Education (AAAPE) for five years, as well as, being the third president (1899) of the Society of Physical Education in College, a forerunner for today's NAKHE.
